

Introduction: Knowledge, Power, and the “Settler Colonial Turn” in Palestine Studies

Journal:	Interventions
Manuscript ID	Draft
Manuscript Type:	Special Issue Paper
Keywords:	Palestine, settler colonialism, indigeneity, resistance, Israel

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

Introduction: Knowledge, Power, and the “Settler Colonial Turn” in Palestine Studies

This special issue presents articles on the topic of “Settler Colonialism in Palestine,” covering conceptual and empirical, historical and contemporary, as well as literary, legal and political aspects of the debate. All articles examine the validity and applicability of the settler colonial paradigm to the context of Palestine (West Bank, Gaza Strip, East Jerusalem, and the 1948 territories). They approach this paradigm as a powerful means to challenge and disarticulate established historiographies and narratives, and, as such, engage with settler colonialism as a structure (Wolfe, 1999, 2006), but also with the various forms of resistance and decolonisation that aim at undoing this structure.

1. The 2015 Exeter “Settler Colonialism in Palestine” Conference

The special issues stems from an academic conference organised by the European Centre for Palestine Studies (ECPS) at the University of Exeter and funded by the UK’s Arts and Humanities Research Council (AHRC).¹ The conference, held under the title of “Settler Colonialism in Palestine”, took place in October 2015 and aimed to discuss the application of the paradigm to the case of Palestine, as reflected in the content of the present special issue. It was followed by a workshop on the Naqab Bedouin, gathering the main experts in the field. In the pursuit of fresh and original discussion, the event welcomed established academics and emerging scholars into a space for lively debate. The conference aimed at exploring the interpretative opportunities for further scholarly work on Palestine offered by the settler colonial paradigm, as well as testing the limits of the application of a concept that has been mainly developed with regards to white Anglo-Saxon settler colonies (Australia, Canada, Aotearoa/New Zealand, etc.). The main questions that were raised not only regarded the intellectual and political opportunities opened up by a settler colonial lens of analysis (Lorenzo Veracini tackles this problem at length in his contribution to this issue), but also delved deeper into the historical circumstances that produced and continue to reproduce present colonial practices of dispossession, displacement, violence and elimination against Palestine’s native population.

Shortly before the conference, we, the organizers,² were informed that the conference, which was originally scheduled to take place in Exeter’s main campus where the ECPS usually runs its activities, would be moved to the picturesque but rather isolated St. Luke’s campus. What at first glance may seem an irrelevant anecdote is in fact an indication of the amount of political frenzy that followed the publication of the conference call for papers, and which shook for a few months our otherwise quiet and rural university town. Repeated conversations between the conference organisers, the University’s management, and the Exeter police were required so to ensure the event would take place, and that it would go ahead without infringing on the principle of academic freedom and the intellectual integrity of those participating in the event.

¹ The conference was funded through the AHRC Early Career Fellowship (2014-16) on “Gender and Settler Colonialism: Women’s Oral Histories in the Naqab”.

² The conference was organized by Francesco Amoruso, William Gallois, Andrew Meyer, Ilan Pappé, Sophie Richter-Devroe and Endika Rodriguez-Martin.

1
2
3
4 As Lorenzo Veracini discusses in this issue, comparative work on Palestine and other settler
5 colonies tends to spark significant outcry amongst supporters of Zionism. Repeated efforts to 6 interfere with academic freedom have had the consequence of dragging research out of academia
7 and into Israel's hasbara and lobbying efforts. Two arguments often upheld in Zionist responses
8 to a settler colonial approach on the study of Palestine/Israel are relevant to the topics treated in 9 this special issue and to the context in which the conference took place. The first argument is that 10 Israel is an exceptional case in history, and therefore the Jewish national movement cannot 11 possibly be understood vis-à-vis the impact it has had on the Palestinians. However, settler colonial 12 studies in no way negates differences (which are intrinsic to any comparative endeavour); what it
13 does is to compare what happens when one people replaces—through violent acts of conquest and 14 dispossession—another that had previously established its presence on the land. Israel was founded
15 on and continues to rely on the settler-colonial logic of conquest through displacement,
16 dispossession and elimination of the native Palestinians from their land (as even past Zionist
17 leaders and contemporary commentators have acknowledged; see Degani 2016).

18
19
20
21 The second argument is that looking at Israel as a settler state implies bias and one-sidedness
22 towards the Palestinians. It is this second argument that sustained repeated efforts by various 23 Zionist activists and organisations to halt our event. In a letter to the AHRC aimed at stopping the 24 research body from funding the conference and the attached workshop, head of the Board of 25 Deputies of British Jews Gillian Merron wrote: "It appears that this is a publicly funded attempt 26 to further a political agenda masquerading as an academic exercise" (Firsht 2015a). Similarly, the 27 Jewish Leadership Council (JLC) lamented "a lack of opportunity to submit opposing views on 28 the issue of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict" (University of Exeter News). We find the notion that 29 any critical discussion about Israel needs to necessarily include representatives of all views on the 30 issue questionable. It would be like accusing of bias a conference on British colonialism which 31 does not include at least one discussant believing that Great Britain was never a colonial power
32 (or, likewise, that it justified its colonial rule). Frustrated by their failure in halting the event, the 33 JCL appointed two defenders of the Zionist cause, Alan Johnson (BICOM) and Professor Gabriel
34 Noah Brahm, who attended our conference with the stated purpose of "sharing a Zionist
35 perspective" (Firsht 2015c). Johnson and Brahm contributed to the Q&A sessions, taking it upon 36 themselves to try to discredit the organisers on a personal level and intimidate one of the junior
37 scholars present. Until here nothing new under the sun, had the JLC not released a statement 38 regarding an alleged agreement with the conference organisers, according to which we would have 39 invited the two to participate as commentators to our panels (Firsht 2015b). Not only we dismiss
40 this claim as false, but we restate our contrariety to any form of dialogue that equates the oppressor
41 with the oppressed, or the coloniser with the colonised.

42
43
44
45
46
47 After sustained conversations with the University management, we finally succeeded in going 48 ahead with our conference on "Settler Colonialism in Palestine". Given that other universities had 49 previously cancelled academic conferences deemed "anti-Israeli" such as the 2015 Southampton
50 conference on the State of Israel and international law (Abunimah 2015), we think it is paramount
51 to recognise the success obtained in securing our University's support for the conference. In fact,
52 we hope that Exeter could serve as a precedent for further critical discussions of Israel to take place
53 despite Zionist backlash. We therefore would like to renew our thanks to all the conference and 54 workshop participants, and to the University's leadership, who proved that despite political
55

1
2
3 interference, academic investigations of Zionist settler colonialism in Palestine are destined to 4 grow and, one can only hope, contribute to bring justice and equality for all.
5

6 7 2. State of the Field

8
9 Scholarly engagement with settler colonialism as an historical, geographical and political 10 formation is relatively recent (Piterberg 2008). Of course, among Palestinian writers (e.g. Hilal
11 1976; Said 1979; Sayegh 1965[2012]), settler colonialism has featured as interpretive paradigm
12 for the Zionist invasion since early on. Painfully aware of Zionism's aim to drive the Palestinian 13 natives from the land in order to inhabit it with settler-colonisers, these works highlighted 14 Zionism's settler colonial focus on territorial gains rather than native labour exploitation.
15

16
17 The fact that territorial control and expansion is at the heart of the Zionist settler colonial project
18 moved even more into scholarly focus after the 1967 war, when Israel occupied the West Bank,
19 Gaza and Golan Heights. Maxime Rodinson's Israel: A Colonial-Settler State? (1973)
20 promulgated a settler colonial perspective internationally, and the work of revisionist historians
21 contributed to establishing the paradigm further. These works variously foregrounded Israel's
22 focus on land expropriation and ethnic cleansing of the native population (Pappe 1992); frontier
23 expansionism and land acquisition patterns, also in comparative perspective (Kimmerling 1983)
24 as well as land and labour exploitation (Shafir 1989).
25

26
27 From the mid-1990s onwards the settler colonial paradigm has gained prominence in Palestine
28 Studies, to the extent that one might even speak of a "Settler-Colonial Turn" (Busbridge 2018, 94)
29 emerging. This turn was sparked by Patrick Wolfe's seminal work on settler colonialism on the 30 one hand (1999), and the growing disillusion in Palestine with the 1993 Oslo two-state solution
31 framework, and its conceptual underpinnings which frame Zionist settler colonialism in Palestine
32 as an ethno-national "conflict" between Palestinians and Israelis rather than a settler colonisation, 33 on the other.
34

35
36
37 Countering this orthodox liberal peace paradigm, a steadily growing group of scholars (Piterberg
38 2008, Shafir 1996, Veracini 2010, 2013, 2015; Wolfe 1999, 2006, 2016; Yiftachel 2006, Falah 39 2005, Yiftachel 2006, 2008, Nsarra et al. 2014) have been providing in-depth analysis of the 40 Zionist project as settler colonial. The paradigm has been applied in particular by scholars
41 analysing the context of Palestinians in Israel, studying "the geopolitics of enclavisation" (Falah 42 2005), the "internal colonialism [of Palestinians inside Israel]" (Zureik 1979), or revealing the 43 "ethnocracy" of the Israeli regime which promotes the expansion, settlement and domination of 44 the dominant group in contested areas while maintaining aspects of a democratic form (Yiftachel
45 2006, 2008). A sign of the growing relevance of the paradigm is the foundation of the *Settler
46 Colonial Studies* journal, edited by Edward Cavanaugh and Lorenzo Veracini.³ Since the journal's
47 inception in 2010 three special issues have been dedicated to Israel and Palestine (Salamanca, 48 Qato, Rabie, Samour 2012 Svirsky 2014; Veracini 2015)
49

50
51
52 Patrick Wolfe's (1999, 2006) two-part argument that, one, settler colonialism is based on a "logic 53 of elimination of the native" (2006, 387) and, two, must be understood as a "structure not an event"
54

55
56 ³ (<http://ojs.lib.swin.edu.au/index.php/settlercolonialstudies/index>).

1
2
3 (2006, 338), has laid the foundations for the expansion of a critical and revisionist scholarship that
4 adopts the settler colonial paradigm to analyse Israeli rule over Palestine and Palestinians. Wolfe
5 argued that settler colonisation is not a one-off event, but rather an ongoing structure whose
6 primary aim is the elimination of the native to secure settler control over the land. As a continuous
7 project of indigenous displacement, removal and depopulation, the ultimate aim of settler
8 colonialism is to eliminate the native and inhabit the land with the settler population.
9

10
11 As such, settler colonialism is decidedly different from other forms of colonial rule, in particular 12 in its relation to the indigenous colonized population and as regards land and labour relations. In 13 colonial settings the indigenous are ruled predominantly from the metropole, whereas settler-
14 colonisers come to stay on the land and aim to erase indigenous presence (Veracini 2013, 27).
15 Settler colonialism thus in an ongoing event, as Wolfe explains:
16

17
18 settler colonies were (are) premised on the elimination of the native societies. The split
19 tensing reflects a determinate feature of settler colonization. The colonizers come to stay-
20 invasion is a structure, not an event (Wolfe 1999, 1).
21

22
23 Wolfe's focus on the structural continuity of settler colonialism thus also highlighted that the 24 'elimination of the native' is not a one-off event, but takes different and evolving forms and 25 modalities (see articles by Nutt and by Rodriguez-Martin, this issue). The logic of elimination 26 passes through various stages: expulsion and killing, but also assimilation, and various forms of 27 discursive elimination. While the Israeli state continues to expel, displace and ethnically cleanse
28 Palestinians (see Pappé 2006), it has also tried to eliminate the indigenous population by 29 assimilating them as well as discursively erasing them denying them their status and as natives of 30 – and thus with rights to – the land (see Rouhana and Sabbagh-Khoury, this issue). Wolfe explains:
31

32
33 This logic [of elimination] certainly requires the elimination of the owners of that territory,
34 but not in any particular way. [...]. Indeed, depending on the historical conjuncture, 35 assimilation can be a more effective mode of elimination than conventional forms of 36 killing, since it does not involve such a disruptive affront to the rule of law that is 37 ideologically central to the cohesion of settler society. When invasion is recognized as a 38 structure rather than an event, its history does not stop—or, more to the point, becomes 39 relatively trivial—when it moves on from the era of frontier homicide. Rather, narrating
40 that history involves charting the continuities, discontinuities, adjustments, and departures
41 whereby a logic that initially informed frontier killing transmutes into different modalities, 42 discourses and institutional formations as it undergirds the historical development and 43 complexification of settler society. (Wolfe 2006, 402)
44
45

46
47 What liberal logic presents positively as policies of integration, access and/or assimilation thus 48 might in fact constitute in a settler colonial context a form of elimination of the native in disguise.
49 This is particularly relevant in the case of contemporary settler colonial practices, such as Israel's,
50 where the state employs strategies of elimination while also simultaneously striving to preserve its 51 image as 'multicultural' modern liberal democracy. We might ask then how policies which isolate 52 individuals from non-national (e.g. kinship, see Wolfe 2006, 397) structures, integrate them into 53 wage labour, or transfer communal lands to individual property – that is policies that aim at 54 transforming and uplifting the native to 'modern' autonomous citizens, owners and/or legal 55
56

1
2
3 subjects – are not only modernising trajectories, but also function to eliminate the native. The 4 relationship between settler colonialism’s logic of elimination and liberal democracies thus can be
5 commensurable and mutually reinforcing.
6

7
8 Furthermore, settler colonialism also differs from colonialism in its structuring of labour relations.
9 As Shafir (1996) has shown, settler colonialism depends on the elimination of the indigenous 10 labourer and economic separatism rather than colonialism’s racialised labour exploitation. While 11 some of the early settler colonial scholarship also employed class as an analytical lens, reading the 12 relationship between settler-colonizers and the colonized as one dominated by their labour
13 relations, and relation to the means of production (see e.g. Hilal 1976), Shafir (1996) provided a
14 comprehensive typology of different colonies. Out of the four types he describes, ‘pure settlement
15 colony’ aimed at maximising settler and eliminated indigenous presence on the land. In such a
16 settler colony the economy should rely on the labour force of the settlers, not the native colonized.
17 Pure settler states’ economies, such as Israel, rely on settler and immigrant labour force while 18 using the resources and land expropriated from the indigenous population. In Israel the conquest
19 of labour thus depended on the conquest of land, and it is here that that state violence and exclusion
20 was coupled with forced displacement and land expropriation (Yiftachel 2003). Settler
21 colonialism’s focus on territory is thus tightly linked to its logic of elimination. Settler colonialism,
22 in contrast to colonialism, does not destroy to exploit, but to replace (Wolfe 2006, 388).
23
24
25

26 Replacing means eliminating the indigenous, but, as an ongoing structure, settler colonialism also 27 requires the settlers’ continuous striving to indigenize (see Veracini, 2013 and this issue). Veracini 28 (2013 and this issue) maintains that while colonialism operates by sustaining and maintaining the 29 difference between colonizer and colonized, “a settler colonial project is ultimately successful only 30 when it extinguishes itself—that is, when the settlers cease to be defined as such and become 31 “natives,” and their position becomes normalized” (2013, 28). Settlers thus need to indigenize.
32
33

34 Veracini (2013 and this issue) argues that while Zionist settler colonialism was successful in 35 maintaining this classic settler colonization model in the 1948 areas of Historical Palestine, today’s
36 Israel, it did not manage to continue this model after the 1967 occupation of the West Bank, Gaza,
37 East Jerusalem and Golan Heights. Whereas the Zionist regime adopted a strategy of eliminating 38 the native through population transfer, cleansing and killing before during and after the Nakba, 39 and then continued to assimilate, through for example extension of settler citizenship (a form of 40 eliminating indigenous claims), the minority of Palestinian who remained in what became Israel, 41 they could not do so in the 1967 Occupied Territories. Palestinians constitute the majority in the 42 Occupied Territories; the distinction between ruler and ruled, occupier and occupied thus is starkly
43 maintained, not dissolved. Settler colonizers did not manage to indigenize in the Occupied
44 Territories.
45
46
47

48 On the one hand, the occupation is essential to the entire settlement project, and 49 dismantling it would jeopardize the viability of the settlements themselves. On the other
50 hand, the occupation erases the very conditions necessary to produce a viable settler
51 colonial project. It is a double bind from which, from the Zionist point of view, there is no
52 way out. Israeli planners thought they could achieve settler colonial goals via essentially
53 colonial means, apparently not realizing how inherently antithetical the two circumstances
54 are. (Veracini, 2013:32)
55
56
57

1
2
3
4 For Veracini the aims and structures of occupation/colonization and settler colonialization thus 5 ultimately are incompatible.
6
7

8 Given these marked differences between occupation, colonialism and settler colonialism, the 9 indigenous population's quest and strategies for decolonization thus also might differ in the two 10 contexts. Wolfe's structuralist account has been critiqued for leaving little space for indigenous 11 agency, resistance and politics (see, among others, Busbridge 2018; Svirsky 2014), and for reifying
12 and essentialising the polarity between settler and native (see Svirsky and Ben Arie, this issue) –
13 how can decolonization happen if settler colonialism is an ongoing structure aimed at the 14 elimination of the native? What forms of agency are available to the native if the relations between 15 settler-colonizer and colonized are understood through such absolute binarism? And might settler 16 colonialism, as a paradigm, risk foreclosing transformative and decolonizing perspectives and 17 agencies?
18
19

20 In addition to interrogating the paradigm of settler colonialism at a conceptual level, the 21 contributions in this special issue aim to answer these questions, highlighting the different forms
22 of decolonization, agency and resistance as enacted by the colonised themselves.
23
24
25

26 3. SUMMARY OF ARTICLES IN THIS SPECIAL ISSUE 27 28 29

30 Despite the variety of topics and disciplinary approaches present in this special issue, its 31 contributors follow a common thread aiming to discuss the relationship between a geographical 32 locale, Palestine, and the explanatory potential of a conceptual tool box, the settler colonial 33 paradigm, for the exploration of this place and its peoples' past, present, and future. Some of the 34 authors choose to depart from an analysis of different aspects of the settler colonial reality of 35 Palestine to problematize, expand, or highlight the importance of the settler colonial paradigm.
36 Such is the case of the opening article, co-authored by Marcelo Svirsky and Ronnen Ben Arie,
37 which condenses much larger research that has recently been published in a book (2018). Their 38 contribution, titled "Settler Colonialism and the Logic of Double Elimination", makes a significant 39 intervention in the way Patrick Wolfe's "elimination of the native" is usually understood.
40 Departing from an historical analysis of forms of shared life between Jews, Muslims, Christian
41 and other groups under Ottoman rule, they complicate Wolfe's binarism and suggest that the 42 termination of shared existence in Palestine was not a by-product of Zionist invasion, but 43 paramount to the success of the settler colonial project. In this sense elimination is double as it
44 targets both the social reproduction of the indigenous Palestinian collective and the possibility of 45 Palestine's Jews subtracting themselves from the unequal relations that mark settler colonial
46 realities. Their work also contributes to situate racialization as a core process within settler
47 identity-construction and the parallel destruction of identities that challenged the erasure of shared 48 life as part of the erasure of indigenous life worlds.
49
50
51

52 A similar approach emphasising the importance of historical research into the specific articulations
53 of the Zionist project in Palestine is employed by Endika Rogriduez-Martin. His methodologically 54 sound and fact-based demographic analysis of the impact of land purchases on the demographic 55
56
57

1
2
3 balance in the sub-districts of Haifa and Nazareth during the British Mandate period points toward
4 the centrality of land purchases for creating the demographic preconditions to the 1948 Nakba.
5 Built on thorough archival research and the redesigning of British colonial censuses, Rodriguez
6 Martin's article revisits population sources and reads them against settler colonial theory to argue
7 that the Mandate period is indeed far more crucial in creating the demographic preconditions for 8 the 1948 Nakba than so far understood. Despite Jewish land ownership accounting for a mere six
9 percent by the time the Jewish state was established, the demographic consequences of land
10 purchases went far beyond the sheer amount of land acquired by the Jewish National Fund and 11 other Zionist companies. Taking as an illustrative example the sub-districts of Haifa and Nazareth, 12 the article quantifies the impact of land purchases in terms of demography, and digs deeper into 13 the politics of land purchases. Rogriduez-Martin's contribution also provides a demographic 14 perspective on the flexibility of settler movements in terms of adjusting their means for population 15 transfer to determinate historical circumstances and population patterns.
16
17
18

19 Stephen Nutt's "Pluralized Sovereignities" also departs from the settler colonial reality of Palestine, 20 understood through the lenses of Patrick Wolfe's conceptualisation of invasion, to unpack the 21 notion of state sovereignty in order to better understand the destruction of Indigenous life-worlds.
22 If sovereignty is typically interested by a fundamental tension, that between the absolute power of 23 the state and the constituent revolutionary forces that gave birth to the sovereign in the first
24 instance, then settler colonialism comes to represent the ground on which European modernity
25 resolves this contradiction. On the frontier, and by the means of the elimination of the native, the 26 paradox of sovereignty is played out "both literally – in the expansion of self-determining settler
27 societies into space — and figuratively in an ongoing discourse on decentralised constituent power
28 that fetishizes the frontier and the native it encounters there". In the context of Palestine, Nutt
29 argues, the production of a mythology of wilderness parallel to the American one could not take 30 place, and was therefore replaced rhetorically by the desertification of Palestine as a political space.
31 This was achieved by the means of the conquest of labour in the pre-state period as an attack on
32 Palestinians' possibilities of social reproduction, and in the culminating moment of the 1947-48
33 ethnic cleansing. The multiplicity of sovereignties that exercise eliminatory power over Indigenous 34 people does not cease with their physical elimination — and in the case of Palestine did not end in 35 1948. Today's frontier expansion in the territories seized in 1967 is an example of how the state,
36 the IDF, and the settlers — a plurality of sovereign agents — enable a process of structural invasion
37 that finds its roots in the constitution of belligerent settlements in the pre-state period.
38
39
40
41

42 The last three articles featured in this issue instead take a direct look at the settler colonial paradigm
43 and use it as a conceptual tool to analyse historical, political, and discursive aspects of Zionist
44 settler colonialism and Palestinian resistance to it.
45
46

47 Nadim Rouhana and Areej Sabbagh-Khoury adopt the settler colonial paradigm to analyse
48 developments in Palestinian group identity, resistance, and political behaviour within the 49 internationally recognised borders of the settler state. Their article employs the concept of return 50 of history to explore the relation between narrative and political consciousness amongst the 51 Palestinian constituency within the 1948 territories, today's Israel. The Nakba is here taken as the 52 defining experience in Palestinian history, and its absence/return within the collective memory and 53 discourse of Palestinians in the 1948 territories is seen as crucial for understanding shifts in the 54 community's political and cultural discourses and behaviour. The authors define the return of 55
56
57

1
2
3 history “as the process in which a dormant past is reconstituted and becomes a constitutive force
4 in present collective consciousness and in envisioning the political future”. Such a framework is
5 particularly apt for analysing political mobilisation amongst Indigenous communities within settler
6 states. Indigenous histories are indeed fundamentally incompatible with those of the settler
7 collectives, as Indigenous oppression and elimination is premised upon the erasure of their 8 presence in history. The return of the Nakba in Palestinian public discourse within the state of 9 Israel needs therefore be understood as the defining force of current articulation of the group’s
10 collective consciousness. The political consequence of the return of history is that Palestinian
11 citizens of Israel are increasingly aware that the two-state solution framework does not address the 12 issue of their ongoing marginalisation and colonisation.
13
14

15
16 Equally concerned with the production of narratives and counter-narratives within a settler colonial 17 context is Samar AlJahdali’s literary analysis of two novels centred around the events of the Nakba, 18 Elias Khoury’s Gate of the Sun (1988) and Leon Uri’s The Haj (1984). Her article that seeks to 19 revisit the settler colonial paradigm in order to better understand the inseparable relationship
20 between Zionist settler narratives and American imperial narratives — hence the analysis of the 21 Jewish American author’s novel. AlJahdali’s article sheds light on the epistemic erasure of the 22 Palestinian narrative in history and in fiction, as demonstrated through her textual analysis. This 23 contrapuntal reading of the two novels highlights the power of writing in the production of 24 narratives and counter-narratives, with a particular focus on Khoury’s narration “from below” of 25 the exodus of Palestinians from the Northern Galilee in 1948. Crucially, whereas Uri produces a
26 typical linear narrative of settler immigration and Indigenous disappearance, Khoury resists
27 closure and persists with a circular narrative that rests on the continuity of the Nakba as an 28 unfinished process, and on the enactment of return.
29
30

31
32 Closing this issue, Lorenzo Veracini’s article on the interpretative value of settler colonial studies
33 and its contribution in reframing the Palestinian-Israeli “conflict”. Veracini’s article is interested
34 in the political relevance of adopting a settler colonial lens to analyse the past, present, and future
35 of Palestine. In light of the demise of the two-state solution, Veracini argues that understanding 36 the present reality as a settler colonial one is necessary to imagining decolonial scenarios that take 37 into account the specificities of settler colonialism as a distinct mode of domination. This 38 contribution offers a number of valuable insights on Zionism as settler colonialism, and does so
39 debunking exceptionalist claims that argue that settler colonialism cannot explain Zionism because 40 it obscures its specific characteristics. Veracini counter-argues reminding us that settler
41 colonialism as a comparative field is in fact preoccupied with the analysis of the context-specific 42 relations that settler collectives establish with indigenous peoples, and does not aim to conclude 43 that all settler colonial movements are exactly the same. Veracini in particular is interested in 44 understanding how Israel is performing as a settler state, compared to other settler states, and what 45 such understanding means in terms of opening up spaces for decolonisation. In line with previous 46 writings (2007, 2013), he argues that the occupation of 1967 and the subsequent colonial policy of 47 segregation in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem, sits in contradiction with the policy of 48 subordinate integration (e.g. through extension of citizenship rights to erase Indigenous 49 sovereignty) that has characterised the way the state has dealt with its Palestinian citizens. Hence,
50 while seeking to erase the Palestinian collective, the occupation in fact constitutes it and condemns
51 Israel to a perpetual inability to complete the settler colonial project in historic Palestine.
52
53
54
55
56
57

1
2
3 Veracini's current and past contributions are premised on the understanding that historically
4 "settler colonialism has been remarkably resistant to decolonisation" (2007, 1). However, this does
5 not mean that the settler colonial analytical paradigm prevents us from analysing, and proposing
6 strategies for, decolonisation. Nor does the fact that Israeli settler colonialism has been very
7 resistant to decolonization mean that Palestinians cannot find ways to enact their agency and resist
8 this complex matrix of control. It is true that particularly Wolfe's structural lens foregrounds an 9 analysis of settler colonialism as a system. But, given that the settler colonial paradigm stresses
10 the distinctiveness and difference of settler colonialism from colonialism, it also alerts us to read
11 and frame the so-called 'conflict' in Palestine differently, and, relatedly, look for, think through 12 and propose alternative forms decolonization different from both the liberal peace paradigm and 13 "classic" anti-colonial national struggles.
14
15

16
17 The settler colonial analytical lens thus, we conclude, is needed for genuine decolonization
18 proposals (see also Salamanca, Qato, Rabie, Samour, 2012). A settler colonial perspective
19 unmask Oslo's liberal peace paradigm and its two-state solution as false promises, that fail to 20 acknowledge and address the root causes of settler colonisation in Palestine. Instead, it encourages
21 us to analyse the ways in which a settler colonial context, such as Palestine, would need to be
22 decolonized through models such as a binational or one-state solution that would extend equal 23 citizenship and rights to the land for all.
24
25

26 The settler colonial perspective thus pushes us to rethink modes and models of liberation and 27 decolonization. This means not only thinking beyond the classic two-state solution, but also 28 approaching liberation and decolonization from perspectives other than classic national 29 anticolonial frames (Salih, Richter-Devroe 2018) and starting our analysis from local modes of 30 indigenous struggles for decolonization (Pappe 2018). An indigenous perspective in this regard is 31 particularly needed, as argued in a recent article by Rana Barakat (2017) in which she engages 32 critically with Veracini's argument. Barakat observes that from an Indigenous political 33 perspective, the paradigm of success/defeat tends to reproduce settler narratives of conquest and 34 does not aid Indigenous political objectives. We understand her argument as an important instance 35 and reminder of the importance of "indigenist" interventions in the field of settler colonial studies.
36 Looking ahead, we believe the settler colonial paradigm should not act as a straitjacket on 37 knowledge production in and on Palestine. Rather, we hope that it can offer ways to think and push
38 beyond established epistemological frameworks that have dominated the scholarship on Palestine
39 and Israel, and offer new and alternative indigenous ways of decolonizing Palestine.
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Abunimah, Ali. 2015. "Univ. of Southampton cancels conference after government, Israel lobby pressure." The Electronic Intifada, 31 March 2015. <https://electronicintifada.net/blogs/ali-abunimah/univ-southampton-cancels-conference-after-government-israel-lobby-pressure>

Barakat, Rana. 2018. "Writing/righting Palestine studies: settler colonialism, indigenous sovereignty and resisting the ghost(s) of history." Settler Colonial Studies 8(3): 349-363.

Busbridge, Rachel. 2018. "Israel-Palestine and the Settler Colonial 'Turn': From Interpretation to Decolonization." Theory, Culture & Society 35(1): 91–115.

Degani, Arnon. 2016. "Israel Is a Settler Colonial State – and That's OK." Haaretz online, 13 September 2016. <https://www.haaretz.com/opinion/.premium-israel-is-a-settler-colonial-state-and-that-s-ok-1.5433405>

Firsht, Naomi. 2015a. "Board concerned over Exeter University conference on Israeli 'colonialism'." The Jewish Chronicle, 11 August 2015. <https://www.thejc.com/news/uk-news/board-concerned-over-exeter-university-conference-on-israeli-colonialism-1.68071>

Firsht, Naomi. 2015b. "Exeter University agrees to compromise over Israeli settlements conference." The Jewish Chronicle, 16 September 2015. <https://www.thejc.com/news/uk-news/exeter-university-agrees-to-compromise-over-israeli-settlements-conference-1.58226>

Firsht, Naomi. 2015c. "Deal over Israel conference is a 'waste of time'." The Jewish Chronicle, 1 October 2015. <https://www.thejc.com/education/student/deal-over-israel-conference-is-a-waste-of-time-1.59174>

Falah, Ghazi-Walid. 2005. "The Geopolitics of 'Enclavisation' and the Demise of a Two-State Solution to the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict." Third World Quarterly 26(8): 1341–72.

Hilal, Jamil. 1976. "Imperialism and settler colonialism in West Asia: Israel and the Arab Palestinian struggle." Utafi 1(1): 51–70.

Kimmerling, Baruch. 1983. Zionism and Territory: The Socio-territorial Dimensions of Zionist Politics. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Nsarra, Mansour, Sophie Richter-Devroe, Sarab Abu Rabia-Queder, and Richard Ratcliffe. 2014. The Naqab Bedouin and Colonialism: New Perspectives, London: Routledge.

Piterberg, Gabriel. 2008. The Returns of Zionism: Myths, Politics and Scholarship in Israel, London: Verso.

Pappe, Ilan. 1992. The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947–1951. London: I.B.Tauris.

Pappe, Ilan. 2006. The Ethnic Cleansing of Palestine. Oneworld Publishers.

- 1
2
3
4 Pappé, Ilan. 2018. "Indigeneity as Cultural Resistance: Notes on the Palestinian Struggle Within 5 21st Century Israel." South Atlantic Quarterly 117(1): 157-178.
6
7
8 Rodinson, Maxime. 1973. Israel: A Colonial-Settler State? New York: Monad Press.
9
10 Salamanca, Omar Jabary, Mezna Qato, Kareem Rabie and Sobhi Samour. 2012. "Past Is Present:
11 Settler Colonialism in Palestine." Settler Colonial Studies 2(1).
12
13 Salih, Ruba and Sophie Richter-Devroe. 2018. "Palestine beyond National Frames: Emerging 14 Politics, Cultures, and Claims." South Atlantic Quarterly 117(1).
15
16
17 Said, Edward. 1979. The Question of Palestine. London: Routledge.
18
19 Sayegh, Fayez A. 2012[1965]. "Zionist colonialism in Palestine." Settler Colonial Studies 2(1): 20 206–225.
21
22
23 Settler Colonial Studies website (2011).
24 <http://ojs.lib.swin.edu.au/index.php/settlercolonialstudies/index>
25
26 Shafir, Gershon. 1989. Land, Labor, and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict 1882–
27 1914. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
28
29 Shafir, Gershon. 1996. "Zionism and Colonialism: A Comparative Approach." In Israel in 30 Comparative Perspective: Challenging the Conventional Wisdom, edited by Michael Barnett. New 31 York: State University of New York Press.
32
33
34 Svirsky, Marcelo. 2014. "The collaborative struggle and the impermeability of settler
35 colonialism." Settler Colonial Studies 4(4): 327–333.
36
37
38 Svirsky, Marcelo and Ronnen Ben-Arie. 2018. From Shared Life to Co-Resistance in Historic 39 Palestine. London and New York: Rowman & Littlefield.
40
41 University of Exeter News. 17 September 2015. "Jewish Leadership Council and University of 42 Exeter announce new approach to debating issues pertaining to Israeli-Palestinian conflict."
43 http://www.exeter.ac.uk/news/archive/2015/september/title_471745_en.html
44
45
46 Veracini, Lorenzo. 2007. "Settler colonialism and decolonization." borderlands e-journal 6(2).
47 <https://ro.uow.edu.au/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=2342&context=lhapapers>
48
49 Veracini, Lorenzo. 2010. Settler Colonialism: A Theoretical Overview. Houndmills: Palgrave
50 Macmillan.
51
52
53 Veracini, Lorenzo. 2011. "Introducing Settler Colonial Studies." Settler Colonial Studies 1(1): 1– 54 12.
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Veracini, Lorenzo. 2013. "The Other Shift: Settler Colonialism, Israel, and the Occupation."
4 Journal of Palestine Studies XLII(2): 26–42.
5

6 Veracini, Lorenzo. 2015. "What can settler colonial studies offer to an interpretation of the conflict
7 in Israel–Palestine?" Settler Colonial Studies 5(3): 268–271.
8

9
10 Wolfe, Patrick. 1999. *Settler Colonialism and the Transformation of Anthropology: The Politics
11 and Poetics of an Ethnographic Event*. London & New York: Cassell.
12

13 Wolfe, Patrick. 2006. "Settler Colonialism and the Elimination of the Native." *Journal of Genocide
14 Research* 8(4): 387–404.
15

16
17 Yiftachel, Oren. 2006. Ethnocracy: Land and Identity Politics in Israel/Palestine. Philadelphia:
18 University of Pennsylvania Press.
19

20 Yiftachel, Oren. 2008. "Epilogue: Studying Naqab/Negev Bedouins—Toward a colonial 21 paradigm?" HAGAR Studies in Culture, Polity and Identities 8(2): 83–108
22

23
24 Zureik, Elias T. 1979. Palestinians in Israel: A Study of Internal Colonialism. London: Routledge
25 and Kegan Paul.
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60